TO THE VOTERS OF APPOMATTOX COUNTY:

I have been reliably informed that word is being circulated against me in this County to the extent that I closed up some lawful games at a Church Sponsored Carnival recently. This is absolutely false. The facts are that a carnival sponsored by the local Fire Department was recently held just outside of the town of Appomattox for a week. Some of our good citizens complained to me that the Carnival People were operating bad gambling devices there. I made an investigation and found this be true and required them to close 5 or 6 gambling booths. I did this because were openly violating the criminal laws to a great extent.

I have taken an oath of office to enforce the criminal laws in this county and expect to do so as long as I am Sheriff. I believe the good people of Appomattox County will approve the action I took in this matter and will not approve open and distinct gambling violations.

Sincerely,

David T. Robertson.

Geniuses Required but Little Sleep; Relied on Catnaps

'Tis said that many geniuses could get along on very little sleep. Notable among the famous people who, reportedly, slept very little was Thomas Edison. Although he slept on the average of just four hours a night, he often took cat naps during the day to replenish his energy supply and to keep him mentally alert.

David O. Selznick, famous Hollywood producer, is noted for his odd working hours. He says that he finds he is able to make time for his various movie jobs if he works straight through from Monday evening till Tuesday night. Although he regularly skips his Monday night sleep, he makes up for it by sleeping all day Wednesday and Thursday.

Sir Henry Luce's entertaining memoirs of English social life, he tells of a certain Lady Anne, a charming dowager of 84, whose energy amazed all London. The explanation of her energy, however was simple enough. She remained in bed in a darkened room and away from noise for 24 hours one day each week. By doing so, she preserved her youth.

Tallyrand, the noted French diplomat, followed much the same sleep pattern during his brilliant and highly succesful career. However the affairs of state were so that he couldn't see any clear way out, he just put an "in conference" sign on his door and went home to sleep.

U.O. Historian Writes Book On Generals and Politicians

Americans should read French history to avoid the problems that arise when military leaders step out of the roles for which they are trained and try to become policy makers.

This is the opinion expressed by Dr. Jere Clemens King, assistant professor of history on the Los Angeles campus of the University of California, in discussing his new book Generals and Politicians.

Published by the University of California Press, the book is an attempt to throw light on the problems of France between 1814 and 1918 when generals were in position to dictate policies.

Generals and Politicians points up the theory of Clausewitz that "policy is the intelligent factor, war only the instrument" . . . "The subordination of the military point of view to the political is, therefore, the intelligent course of action," explained Dr. King.

This is what happened recently in Europe, when General Eisenhower after surveying the situation and making recommendations, left final decisions on rearming Germany in the hands of civilian authorities. In Korea, on the other hand, General MacArthur attempted to handle the role of policy maker, with the resulting United Nations setbacks, said Dr. King.

Small Orders, Too

A graphic illustration of the United States Army's success is breaking down large procurements so that small business might participate was given in an address by Secretary of the Army Frank Pace, Jr. He said: "Recently an order for 1,120,000 pieces of underwear was broken down so that 21 firms got contracts, 14 of them small enterprises; an order for 980,000 pairs of combat boots was spread to 17 manufacturers, 4 of them small; 4 firms were enabled to participate in making approximately 6,000 radio sets of a certain type; the purchase of 135,000 electronic control boxes likewise was spread to five firms; a $1,000,000 purchase of clips for 30 caliber ammunition was split three ways, two of the successful firms being small businesses, a $13,000,000 purchase of a piece of fire control apparatus, which normally would be filled from two sources, is being split into 25 contracts. These are typical."

Age of Scrambles

Future historians may refer to this era as the "Scramble Age," according to National Patent Council. We have had scrambled corporations, scrambled politics, scrambled television; and now a new method for scrambling telephone conversations has been invented and patented by John C. Steinberg, Short Hills, N.J. You simply dictate your message on a record, play the record into your telephone; and the funny sounds it makes defy all eavesdroppers. At the other end of the line, the message is received on a record. The recipient adjusts the record to the proper code and hears the message as it was originally dictated. The invention has been assigned to the Bell Telephone Laboratories.

Inviting Room

A distinctive living room furnished in the Colonial style has rich green painted walls with white ceiling and trim. The maple furniture blends with the warm-toned, gleaming floor and a circular rug of creamy beige matches the upholstery of the divan. White lamps with scarlet shades provide colorful contrast and the draperies at the windows combine scarlet, beige and green in a floral pattern against a white background. The deep green of the walls is echoed again in cushions on the divan and in growing plants which contribute beauty,

Prison Inmates Said By Warden to Have Key to Longer Life

OSSINING, N.Y.—Are you interested in a long life? If you are interested enough, get yourself committed to prison.

Warden Wilfred L. Denno of Sing Sing believes people live longer in prison than they do in the great outside.

Although he has made no extensive study, and has no statistics, the warden is convinced that ordinary towns of 1,800 have a higher death rate than occurs among the 1,800 reluctant tenants of the famed institution.

"It's the regular hours," he explains. He goes on to point out, however, that he is not trying to drum up business, or new inmates, but "I would say that the life span of the average man in jail is longer than it is for the average person on the outside. They eat, sleep and work the same time every day. There's no dissipation."

Another contributing factor he outlined is the fact that prisoners get good care and take good care of themselves. They go to see the prison doctor at the slightest provocation, whereas the average person goes only when he is ailing.

"Prison pallor" is a lot of "bunk," the warden states. "These fellows get plenty of sunshine, air and exercise. In no case is their health impaired after they get here, and in many cases it is actually improved by the regular habits."

Sing Sing inmates work a five and a half day week and are free Saturday noon until Monday morning to play games, watch movies, or do anything but leave. The prison death rate from natural causes is very low. Last year it was two; the average is three per year. Unnatural causes — as electrocution — accounts for seven deaths so far this year.

Heart Disease Kills More Than Is Shown by Records

Heart disease, long recognized as the No. 1 killer, accounts for even more deaths than previously attributed to it.

This is shown in the report of the Institute of Life Insurance on 1950 death rates among life insurance policyholders, for the first time on the new reporting system for cause of death.

Under the new system, the death rate among policyholders from the combined cardiovascular-renal diseases, commonly termed heart diseases, was down last year from 1949. This rate, however, was materially higher than the rate that would have been projected under the old reporting system. In fact, the increase in the heart disease total due to revising the basis was found to be nearly the equivalent of all deaths from automobile accidents.

During 1950, the new International List of Causes of Death was applied to life insurance mortality statistics and this resulted in changes in classification of many deaths, especially where two or more causes were involved. The doctor's judgment in diagnosis became more important in the final classification than the previous rules had permitted.

It's No Crime!

The days when wearing eyeglasses was considered a minor tragedy are gone forever—particularly in the United States. This change is due not only to great strides in the prescribing and making of glasses and fuller realization by the public of the vital functions that they fulfill, but also to the matter of acceptance from a style standpoint. Prominent figures in all phases of life, from sports to politics and from the theater and movies to industry and commerce, wear eyeglasses, and proudly. Both men and women. In fact, many women consider glasses a positive fashion asset. Smart and personalized styling of frames and their individualized fitting—coupled, of course, with lenses precisely suited to your eyes by the wonders of science—have made eyeglasses an American favorite. As one expert told the ladies, when you wear glasses your eyes are done up in veritable picture frames, in contrast to the "nudity" of the eyes without glasses.

Biggest Star

The largest known star is the invisable companion to the star known as epsilon in the constellation of Auriga, the charioteer. From changes in the light of the bright star, when it passes behind the companion every 27 years, much information may be obtained. The diameter of the companion is about 2,500,000,000 miles, about 3,000 times that of the sun. It is so large that all of the planets of the Solar System out to Saturn could revolve inside it. However, it contains only about forty times as much matter as the Sun, so if we had a piece of it on Earth we would call it a fairly good vacuum, for its density is about a millionth that of air. The temperature is very low (for stars), about 2400 F, so it gives off practically no visible light—only infrared rays.
